These location pictures of Eurotek's versatile range of agio desks demonstrate just how effectively this modular product works within the education sector.

Already well established in universities and colleges, this latest agio installation is at the Post 16 Campus of Shooters Hill College in South London.

Initially, the Campus took delivery of over 100 agio desks for both students and teaching staff to furnish 16 top floor classrooms. The majority of these are used for general studies but two separate suites have been set up for dedicated IT training. In the computer suites, even with a computer screen and terminal on each desk, there is still plenty of free work surface available due to the generous size of the agio desks. In the main classroom areas, the desks vary in size, with a slightly larger version being installed for lecturer use.

Shooters Hill Campus Administrator Lisa McNamee said the College had chosen the agio product because they wanted to create a more mature teaching environment than would have been possible using traditional classroom furniture.

"The transformation has been really impressive," she said. "We have found that the atmosphere is more like a lecture theatre than a strict teacher/pupil classroom and we think the students respond and perform better in this sort of setting," she said.

"With so many students on campus, it was also important that we chose a range of desks which was both robust and flexible. agio fits the bill perfectly," she added.

The new furniture has proved so successful that the College is about to take delivery of a second tranche of agio desks. This time they will be used to furnish relocated administrative offices on the lower floors of the campus.
